

From the Editors

With the completion of another year of The Victorian Naturalist, it is opportune to reflect on this most recent volume as a whole. In the field of natural history publishing in this country, no other journal can claim the unbroken sequence of this one, so we derive no small pleasure in affirming both that fact and the wide-ranging nature of the subject matter on which we focus attention. In volume 129, we have published a total of 26 substantive papers. This sum includes 10 Research Reports that collectively look at many aspects of environmental studies, from vascular plants to bryophytes and mammals to marine species, and including invertebrates and vertebrates. A similar diversity is evident in the 10 Contributions published this year, as well as in the six Naturalist Notes.

The editors look forward to compiling volume 130, and to continuing the promotion of Australian natural history research in all its variety.
